Subject: Distance Learning

We have acquired some excellent distance learning material from one of our funding agencies. It provides an excellent introduction to women's participation, with really interesting case studies. Using this material will allow us to help a far greater number of people, and enable us to run short, local workshops to deal with practical implications.

One problem that the funding agency mentioned is that some people will not study the material properly. The result is that when we attempt to run a workshop we'll have problems. Some people will be keen to develop practical ideas, based on their studies, whereas others may not have even looked at the material.

As we are still planning how to use this DL material, could you suggest ways in which we can encourage people to study it? How can we help them to learn, and how can they be expected to prove that they have studied?
